less this was done, Captain Pendlebury was informed, clearance papers could not be issued under the British law.

The President Adams had booked 231 passengers, and the skipper had no time to argue the matter nor to radio his own government for advice.

"I will load two gallons of brandy," he said, to the Board of Trade executive, "for it is imperative that I clear port."

tive, "for it is imperative that I clear port."

"No," the executive is quoted as replying, "you will load five gallons of brandy, as you will need this to comply with British law on your return voyage, and you cannot legally purchase the brandy in an American port."

Captain Pendlebury loaded the five gallons of brandy as ordered. His clearance papers were then issued and the President Adams arrived yesterday with the brandy under lock and key and intact. It had not been seized or ordered removed from the ship up to last night.
